SLAM Resources has recently acquired a new gold discovery in northern New Brunswick that has "huge potential," the company announced on Wednesday. "It's a brand new area and there is no previous drilling there, so it is an exciting discovery," SLAM CEO Mike Taylor said. In early November, he and a of visible gold. "We saw some large boulders and slabs of quartz there on the surface. Some of them were buried in the ground, just peeking up. We broke some pieces and there were a few specks of visible gold," Taylor said. The company is waiting for test results to determine the grade. "Any amount of gold would be significant at this stage, because it is an early stage. We'll chase

The next step, Taylor said, is to try to expand the scope. "We'll start out and dig where the gold is already and head north where we'll try to stretch it out in all directions. We'll see how big this vein is." The site was originally spotted by prospector Tim Lavoie who staked several claims in the area and labelled them the Northwest Gold Property. SLAM, which has a substantial gold portfolio, later negotiated an option agreement

The New Brunswick Telegraph-Journal recently ran an article on the new discovery which emphasises the excitement which the discovery has brought to the region. It can be
